Big Speech, __ J. FREE SPEECH L. __ (2022)

Technology companies seem omnipotent, omnipresent, and without accountability for their harms to society. Nowhere is this truer than in the realm of Big Speech—the firms who control and profit from large scale user-generated content platforms. With reform through direct regulation likely foreclosed by the First Amendment, recent intervention has focused instead on breaking up these platforms under antitrust law. These proposals tap into both the pragmatic and emotional frustration around the power of private firms over freedom of expression and the public sphere.

But while break up might be valuable in other areas of big tech, its effect on Big Speech is less certain. By translating online speech governance into economic terms and analyzing it through that lens, this Article reveals several novel truths: that individual user speech in platforms is essentially about managing conflicting uses and that the larger a platform becomes the more heterogenous those uses become. Accordingly, while scaling up Big Speech makes the advertising side of the platform exponentially more valuable, it also increases conflicting uses and negative externalities on platforms, making them more difficult and costly to govern. There are thus two different economies on either side of a user-generated platform: an economy of scale on the advertising side of the platform, and a diseconomy of scale on the user-generated content side of the platform.

Given this descriptive reality, this Article does not attempt to analyze the legal feasibility of the new antitrust movement or contemplate its various justifications. Rather, it aims only to analyze one question: will breaking up Big Speech make individual user experience and the digital public sphere better or worse? Its conclusion is narrow, but definitive: breaking up large scale firms that host user-generated platforms will not solve many of the issues Big Speech poses to individual harms and the public sphere, and indeed might worsen the current global speech environment.
